Spotlight on Women in Translation:

Fragrance of the Womb: 3 Women Poets

Translated from the Tamil by Thila Varghese

Fragrance of the Womb By Kanimozhi Karunanidhi

It is not sandalwood.
It's an aroma that is quite unlike musk or the fragrant perfumes sold in pretty bottles these days.
At a very young age, when I used to go to sleep hugging her tightly, her aroma would gently fill my nostrils.
As I wandered about the house wrapping myself in the saree she had cast off,
I would feel as if I had smeared myself with her aroma;
like the earthy smell of the first rain, my mother's aroma
would kindle my desire to fill my lungs with it to the brim.
The aroma, like a panacea, would heal many an injury incurred elsewhere, and would protect me as I slept resting my head on her lap.
Who she is encompasses that also.
Even when the walls of the mind that have risen up high don't let me hug her tight, it still passes me by softly stroking me like a petal ....
Although I've moved far away following the trail of my needs, I still yearn to sprinkle her womb's aroma, which I alone can grasp, abundantly all around my house, curl up and go to sleep!

Lullaby

By Sakthi Jothi

You
have never been free from the many reasons
that cause me distress.

Perhaps
we have never realized this,
and you are also unaware of it.

When we look at the sky, it would either be blue or have black smeared all over,
and the stars that sparkle like tinsels would remind me
of your eyes or mine.

When I want to be myself, you torment me.

You insist that I can't be myself.

You drift away from me, knowing that I can't bear being separated from you even for a few seconds.

You walk,
and I panic thinking that your feet will get sores.

You swallow whatever you lay your hands on,
and I worry
that you'll suffer from hiccups.

You see,
even today,
you are sleeping somewhere afar;
I am fanning here in order for this breeze
to put you to sleep.

Silence

By S. Vijayalakshmi

I wrapped myself
using silence
as a long blanket.

Silence would extend its hand as payback
to the gruesome face
that found pleasure in poking into and scratching at the happiness lingering within me.

When curses and anger
surge within me,
silence would suppress them with ease.

In response to all the critical remarks crowding in on me,
I served silence with a smile.

My silence is the mirror that would show them all,
each and every one,
their own respective faces.
